The History Of Wine

Archeologists have unearthed caves dating back to 5,000b.c. where grape seeds have been found.

In 4,000b.c. an Egyptian King hid his wine in clay pots marked "poison" so the servants wouldn't help themselves to any of his prized drink. A member of his harem, so upset over her plight, made the decision to commit suicide and snuck into the King's chambers. She began to consume the King's wine and found that her mood improved greatly. When the King discovered this breach he showed no anger, but rather chose to consort with the beauty he had discovered. Men have been buying women wine ever since.

Slightly over 2,000 years ago Jesus waved his mighty hand and performed his first miracle by changing water into wine.

In the 17th century the original settlers of the New World brought their 2 most prized possessions on their journey; blacksmithing tools and vine cuttings from European vineyards.

The 18th century saw Ohio as the leading producer of wine in the United States.

In 2004 a tall, thin, graying haired man opened a winery in a suburban Texas shopping center. Some of his fellow winemakers scoffed and agreed that only a fool would attempt to make wine in such a location.

By June of 2005 he had won 26 medals consisting of 8 Golds, 11 Silvers, and 7 Bronzes for his 2003 vintage, more than any other winery in the state of Texas.

Now as he walks into a room they whisper words like "Expert", "Master Vintner", and "Champion".
